

Married man admits, "I don't like to talk much."

Bashful husband says mind-reading no longer working for him

KEEPIQUIET, ON - A husband requesting anonymity has stepped forward, admitting "I don't like to talk much." News of the revelation shocked this quiet Canadian town. Leading citizen and former councillor Jack Shudder, muttered, "We don't much appreciate people going around airing their dirty laundry."

The news attracted national attention because of the man's reasoning. Citing his inability to read his wife's mind, he declared that it was time to get a new communication tool.

"She's a great wife," he said, "but sometimes I have no idea why she does what she does. I figured if I really wanted to be happy with her, I might as well figure out why we don't always see eye to eye."

Asked why the sudden turn of heart, he pointed to a new communication tool called Who's The Driver? "I took a chance and went to a dinner theatre-like evening with my wife. The simple idea that one of us is the driver and one of is the passenger made sense of our whole relationship! I can't speak highly enough about it. I especially liked how the workshop leader linked it to the teachings of Jesus."

Dinner Workshops For Couples or Married Singles

Oakville, ON - The Institute for Present Living & Learning is now running a dinner theatre-like experience for couples who want to communicate better and enjoy each other more. Located at Hampton's fine restaurant in Bronte at the Quality Inn, the dinner workshops are scheduled for Fri and Sat nights Apr 3rd, 9th and 10th. Cost for two is $219 including 3 course dinner. Married singles with bashful spouses are welcome for $129 pp or bring a friend. The tool doesn't require both partners to be effective. Register at whosthedriver.com.

New communication tool invented for married men

BURLINGTON, ON - Business leadership expert and couples coach John Kuypers announced today the invention of a new communication tool that works for bashful men at home. Speaking from his home in Burlington, Ontario, Mr. Kuypers described his unusual discovery.

"I was writing a book for business leaders called The 7 Performance Drivers. One day, it struck me that this tool works at home too. I used it, tinkered with it and persisted. Amazingly, it worked like a miracle!" said Kuypers.

Surprisingly, he used it with his wife without even telling her. The results were so astounding that she demanded to know what he was doing differently. Once she understood it, she also began using it with much satisfaction for both. Kuypers calls the tool, "Who's The Driver." whosthedriver.com.

Mind reading on the way out

OTTAWA, ON - Canada's spy agency, CSIS, has acknowledged that mind reading is on the way out. Despite extended efforts dating back to the cold war, Canadian military intelligence officials have issued a statement that all research into mind-reading techniques has been halted pending further evidence that it has any chance of working between any two people anywhere on the planet.
